49		American and British Mulberry Operation, Normandy, France	June 1944	8x10"	photos collected by Jorgensen as research for the story, "D-Day Plus 5 Years"
49	3663	"From the dock of a coast Guard manned combat transport, a Coast Guard photographer captured this shot as an American Cargo ship was hit by Nazi dive bombers during an air raid on a convoy in the Sicilian invasion. A fire started by bombs dropped amidships, spread rapidly to her munitions supply which exploded to form some picturesque though dangerous patterns across the Mediterranean." 49	4144	"Scene on the Normandy beach-head, June 19,1944. Our foothold once established, everything depends on the ceaseless flow of supplies to troops fighting inland. Along the horizon stretches a dense line of transports and supply ships of all kinds, among which are several Liberty ships. Every conceivable type of landing craft is used to shuttle men and cargoes to the beach-head."	June 1944	8x10"	U.S. Maritime Commission photograph
49	4250	"Cargo ships pour supplies ashore for invaders of France. The channel waters are black with shipping, as reinforcements and supplies are funneled ashore for the conquest of the Cherbourg Peninsula. An almost solid mass of merchant vessels, including many Libertys[hips], feeds the endless stream of shuttling LST's and other landing craft. Balloon barrages float overhead to protect the ships from low-flying enemy strafers. Here is the amazing saga of invasion supply in one panorama by a Coast Guard Combat Photographer." 49	4717	"German prisoners march along Normandy beach to board ships for England, where they will be interned in prison camps. Note how low tide has left the troopship high and dry. Other troop and cargo ships fill the waters beyond in a pattern of supply that spells success for the invasion."	June 1944	8x10"	U.S. Maritime Commission photograph
49	4719	"His hand raised as if to signal, this dead American invader lies in the wash of the surf on the beach of Southern France. He seems to be beckoning to the Liberty ships standing out in Cavalaire Bay. A few yards out from shore, Coast Guardsmen struggle with a bogged down Patrol craft." Ambulances bring casualties to a hospital ship tied up at the LST pier-head at the British pre-fabricated harbor on the Normandy coast while Army Fire Service vehicles are being discharged from the landing craft (tank) in right foreground. By fitting a false beach on to which the LST runs its bow and lowers its ramp the same type of spud pier-head used to form the wharf was converted for use by landing craft." At the British pre-fabricated harbor on the Normandy coast, ambulances move along one of the pier roadways leading to the wharf. This steel roadway, hundreds of feet long, is a series of small bridges joined together by special means to give flexibility and supported on floats so that it can rise and fall with the 20 foot tide." 49	4768	"British "Mulberry" Operation, Normandy, June 1944. The wharf at the British pre-fabricated harbor on the Normandy coast consists of seven specifically designed "Spud pier-heads", steel pontoons with a displacement of approximately 1000 tons. Each pier-head is a "ship" complete with crew quarters, generating sets, storage accommodation, etc. Running out from the shore to these pier-heads are two floating-pier roadways." A concrete caisson in England ready for towing across the channel, 146 of these caissons were constructed in six different sizes to suit various depths of water. Built mainly in the Thames and Southampton areas they were towed empty across the channel, set into positions and sunk by opening special valves. Anti-aircraft guns were placed on the top of most caissons as additional A.A. protection of this harbor."	June 1944	8x10"	U.S. Maritime Commission photograph

49	4777	"American "Mulberry" Operation -- Coast Guard Participated in sinking ships to form breakwater for invasion of Normandy, June 1944. Heavy seas, threatening to demoralize the Normandy landings soon after D-Day, beat against a barricade of sunken ships a half mile off shore. In a carefully planned operation carried through in the wake of the liberation day landings, Coast Guard officers helped supervise the "scuttling" of 23 freighters, loaded with cement, to form an improvised breakwater behind which landing craft were unloaded on the Normandy beach. Here, the fury of the storm lashes at the bulwark of the Key block ship 'Centurion' as a barrage balloon hovers overhead. Object at left is top of a "Phoenix" which was shifted by the storm from its mooring further out. A Liberty and other cargo vessels of the invasion are seen beyond the dashing spray." Reducing the violence of a storm that blew in upon Normandy invasion operations soon after D-Day, a breakwater of sunken freighters shielded Allied landings and cut down the toll of destruction. Coast Guard officers, thoroughly briefed in their job, helped direct the planned sinking of 23 ships to form a breakwater. This photo, made by a Coast Guard Combat Photographer aboard an LCI(L), shows a mountainous wave spending its fury against the 'Centurion', key ship of the chain. 61	TR-13790	"Plainly marked by huge Red Crosses, the Navy hospital ship steams through the Pacific en route to a mercy mission. Unarmed and unarmored, the Solace undauntedly moved in under enemy fire to perform its duties in nearly every Pacific invasion since the assault on bloody Tarwara.
